

Guidelines for Instructor Presence in Distance Education Courses

WVC Policy on Regular and Substantive Instructor-initiated Interaction

Ensuring meaningful interaction among students and between students and the instructor should be a priority for any modality, be it face-to-face or distance education (DE) classes. For DE classes, this means regular and substantive interaction (US Dept. of Education; ACCJC) or regular effective contact (Title V, section 55204). Basically this means that all DE courses must include regular, effective, substantive and engaged interaction between the instructor and students.

A reminder! Distance education is NOT correspondence education. Distance education involves regular and substantive interaction, with due dates for assignments/assessments throughout the term of the course. In contrast, in correspondence education, interaction between the instructor and students is limited and primarily initiated by the student, and the course is self-paced.

Background

The term “regular and substantive interaction” (RSI) originates from 2005 guidelines for federal funding eligibility of correspondence courses versus distance education courses. In 2008, Congress included the regular and substantive requirement as part of its definition of distance education (Higher Education Opportunity Act), thereby creating a federal aid policy distinction between correspondence and distance education programs.

Actions and communications by the U.S. Department of Education have demonstrated the importance of regular and substantive interaction, and clarified the intent and expectations for compliance of RSI:

- 2011 U.S. Department of Education audit of distance learning courses at St. Mary-of-the-Woods College found lack of interaction. Result was a recommendation of return of $42 million in federal aid (issue remains unresolved).
- 2014 Dear Colleague letter which states, “Interaction that occurs only upon the request of the student (either electronically or otherwise) would not be considered regular and substantive interaction.” (IFAP 2014)
- 2017 Education Department Office of Inspector General audit found most courses offered by the Western Governors University failed to meet the “regular and substantive interaction” standard. Result was recommended payback of $713 million in federal aid.
